The Steamship Himalaya. The Himalaya is the largest steamship in the world. She is, in fact, "the Duke of Wellington," not alone of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's fleet, but takes ducal rank among all the merchant steamships at present in existence. The Himalaya is of 3,050 tons in existence. The Himalaya is of 3,550 tons register, equal to over 4,000 tons burden, and is of the extraordinary length of 372 feet 9 inches. The length of keel is 311 feet; breadth for tonnage, 46 feet 2 inches; depth of hold, 24 feet 9 inches. These proportions, when contrasted with the dimensions of other ships, give a great advantage, particularly in length, to the Himalaya; for example, the Duke of Wel-lington, 131 guns, although of greater beam and depth, is inferior in length by 92 feet to the and depth, is inferior in length by 92 feet to the Himalaya. The screw-steamer Great Britain is 333 feet long, or 40 feet shorter than the Himalaya; while the American clipper-ship Great Republic, recently destroyed by fire in New York, was only 325 feet long, or of 47 feet less length than the Himalaya. Although the Himalaya exceeds in so large a degree the length of the Duke of Wellington, yet she is inferior in tonnage to that ship, the Duke of Wellington being 3,759 4-94 tons, or about 209 tons larger than the Himalaya. The superior tons larger than the Himalaya. The superior burden of the Duke of Wellington is produced by her enormous breadth of beam, which is 60 feet, and her depth, which is 57 feet forward and 65 feet aft-both these qualities being indispensable in ships of war to enable them to carry their heavy armament of artillery, with the requisite supplies of ammunition, stores, &c. The Himalaya is built of iron, and was constructed by Messrs. J. C. Mare & Co., of Blackwall. The engines, of 700 horse-power, by Messrs. Penn, of Greenwich, are on the trunk principle, similar to those supplied by that firm to the Agamemnon and other vessels. Their splendid performances cannot be exaggerated they work like the mechanism of a chronometer and propel the ship through the water with in-credible smoothness and ease of motion. The cylinders of the engines are of 84 inches diamper minute are from 50 to 60. The screw is a two-bladed one, on the old principle, of 18 feet diameter, with a 28-feet pitch, and weighs nearly seven tons.

The vessel is full ship-rigged, and the masts, spars, and sails, which have been supplied, are those suitable for a clipper-sailing ship of 1,600 or 1,800 tons. Captain Kellock assures us, from the experience he has already had of the qualities of the vessel, that in a heavy breeze there would be no difficulty it getting eighteen knots or twenty miles an hour out of the ship, by using both steam and canyass. Passengers by using both steam and canvass. Passengers by this magnificent steamer will revel in every luxury and comfort that can be comprehended in a sea voyage. The saloon, nearly one hundred feet in length, will dine one hundred and seventy persons; the bed cabins are the largest eter, with a 31-feet stroke, and the revolutions and most roomy ever yet appropriated to marine travellers. To walk round the spar-deck, pre-cisely one-seventh of a mile has to be traversed. The origin of the Himalaya is, perhaps, one of the most interesting features connected with the progress of steam enterprise. Three years since, the postal contract of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company was on the eve of exstood to be preparing to contest the commercial supremacy of the Indian route with that asso-The Himalaya was, therefore, designed, and it was determined that she should be fitted with paddle-wheel engines of 1,200 horse-power, which it was estimated would give a speed of twenty miles an hour, and enable the run from Southampton to Alexandria to be effected in eight or nine days. Five other ships, of equal if not superior size, were to be built and employed on the other side of the isthmus. If this project had been brought to perfection, the communication between England and our Indian empire would have been facilitated to an extent that can even now be hardly realized. and Calcutta brought within twenty-five days of Southampton. The idea of building five ships of equal size to the Himalaya was, however, abandoned, and, the screw principle just at that time having been tried with favorable results on a small scale by the company, it was decided to fit the Himalaya with screw engines of 700 horse-power, instead of machinery on the paddle-wheel principle. The great success of the Himalya is shown by the extraordinary speed attained at her trial trip in the channel last week, viz., fourteen knots, or sixteen miles an

ship as the Himalaya must be a matter of not pily, the threatened war should break out, there is no telling the uses to which, upon emergencies, this vessel and other steamers of lesser size belonging to the great steam companies might be applied. Three thousand men could might be applied. Three thousand men could be embarked at Southampton, and conveyed by the Himalaya in eleven days to Constantinople or the Black sea; while steamers such as the Colombo, Plata, Atrato, Jason, Argo, Crœsus, and many others, might be despatched with proportionate numbers. By employing temporarily the great steamers usually congregated at Southampton, a small army might in fact be rapidly thrown upon any particular point of the European or Asiatic coast, where the exigencies or unexpected hazards of war should render such succours necessary. For rapidly transporting immense supplies of provisions, ammunition, artillery, or of men to the fleets in the Black sea, in the Mediterranean, or in the Baltio, it is difficult to say what enormous seror the Black sea; while steamers such as the Baltic, it is difficult to say what enormous services might not on emergency be rendered by a few steamers such as these, should the admi-ralty at any time find it desirable to employ them Armed with long Paixhan guus, manned with sufficient force of seamen trained to gutuery, such a ship as the Himalaya would augh to scorn the efforts of any ordinary ships of war to capture her. With her steam-power of 700 horses, she could escape from and outof 700 horses, she could escape from and out-strip in speed any fleet of ships of war, while she would, in a running fight, inflict great damage upon her assailants. The Duke of Wellington, according to accounts recently re-Wellington, according to accounts recently re-ceived from Lisbon, is as easily handled at sea ceived from Lisbon, is as easily handled at sea as a Cowes yacht; and, if we rightly interpret the intelligence which has lately reached us, the admiralty are determined to try, on a more extended scale, the principle of screw line-of-battle ships. Instead of ships of 4,000 tons, 800 horse-power, and carrying 134 guns, there is nothing to prevent the construction of ships 500 feet long, of 10,000 tons burden, and capable of mounting 200 or 250 pieces of ordnance of the largest size. Line-of-battle ships would then be turned into movable fortifications of the most tremendous and destructive character, capable of being transported with incredible rapidity from place to place.

If this principle be once admitted, and there seems nothing to prevent its feasibility, no land fortifications will hereafter be enabled to resist the gigantic naval forces which may be

Russian Positions on the Black Sea Coast, The Cologne Gazette, of the 30th ult., contains the following details relative to the positions of Russia on the eastern coast of the Black sea: Anapa is the most northern point on the eastern coast of the Black sea. It is a celebrated fortress, which the Turks originally constructed to protect their commerce from the tribes of the Caucasus. Since then the Russians have made if the most important position in Circassia. The harbor is open to every wind, and is useless except in the fine season. At Anapa, where the western chain of the Caucasus commences, is situated the real limit of the Russian empire, as it is to the bastions of that fortress that extends the coast, so dreaded, of the Circassians. In spite of their utmost efforts, the Russians have only succeed-ed in establishing isolated forts, the garrisons of which cannot stir out without running the risk of being cut off. This coast extends from Anapa to Gagi, a distance of 187 English miles. Between these two places the traveller passes over a rocky coast, crossed by valleys and crowned by verdant hills, and forming a singular contrast with the masses of white chalk which serve as their base. These hills are covered with a rich vegetation and impene-trable forests, among which are dispersed the cabins and straggling villages of the Circas-

The first port on the coast is Sudjouk-Kale, which the Russians have defended by three redoubts. In this port the Russian squadron captured the English yessel Vixen—an event which produced so great a sensation in 1837. Some way further down is the Bay of Guelendik, the finest and safest on the coast, and the most important station of the Russian flotilla appointed to watch the movements of the Cir cassians. Further on is the bay of Pehiat, at the entrance of which the Russians have had a fort since 1837. Along the coast, inhabited by the formidable tribe of the Chapsuks, are the little bays of Nonian, Djon-hon-hon, Kodos, Subachi, Naidau, and Mamai. This part of Circassia, which is marked by a rich cultivation and numerous villages, opposes the most deter-mined resistance to the Russian rule. Beyond Mamai, the western coast of the Caucasus assumes a more imposing character, the rivers being larger and the general aspect of the hills more rugged and lofty. First of all is seen the fine valley of Sutchali, then the fort of Navakinskoi, Cape Senghi, called the Cape of Herwiles by the secretary and the cape of Hermides. cules by the ancients, and the bays of Komonichelaz and of Kinschuli; next, the sombre fortress of Giga, commanding the entrance into Circassia on the side of Abasia, behind which rise the precipitous rocks which constitute the most elevated points of the Caucasus. In quitting the defiles of Gagi, the huge mountains of Abasia are met with. The princes of Abasia bave been forced to admit the sovereignty of the czar. Pezuuda, famous for its church, which is said to have been founded by point of Abasia; then comes Bomboria, a fort, the garrison of which is decimated by sickness; next Guelendjik, one of the best bays on the coast, where the Russians have a fort, built in 1575 by the Sultan Amurath; and lastly, Iskuriez, where the learned imagine was founded the celebrated Greek colony of Dioscuria, known in the time of the Romans by the name of Sebastopolis, about twenty-five kilometres (fit teen and a half English miles) below Cape Is carias. The river Gilazkha forms the limit be tween Abasia and the principal point of Ja-murzalchaz, extending to the banks of the Ingur, at the mouth of which is the fort of Inak On the left bank of this river commenc the alluvial plains of Mingrelia, which join at a distance of one hundred and fifty kilometres ninety three and a half English miles) in the nterior those of Semeretta and Gouriel.

The mountains of the Caucasus on the north and those of Akalzike on the south, surround this magnificent basin, watered by the rivers Khopi and Rion (Phasis.) Redout-Kale and form the principal points of landing. But it is only small vessels that can enter, on account of the sand-banks which exist there. Large vessels are forced to anchor at 600 metres dis ance from the coast. Since the suppression of the transit and free trade in 1832, Redout Kale and Poti have lost all commercial importance and all prospect of a happy future. It would seem as if the Russian government intends to abandon these towns to their sad fate. They are surrounded by marshy plains from which exhale fetid miasmata. At 20 kilometres (8½ English miles) above the Phasis, the little river Nassa Nelea (Lisis, of Arrian) separates the Russian territory from that of Turkey. In proportion as Fort Nicholas, which is the last military station of Russia in the Gouriel, and which the Turks have lately seized on, is departed from, the low grounds which surround Mingralis disappears is a surround. Mingrelia disappear insensibly.

The Akalzike mountains approach the sea and at Batoun enormous masses of rocks rise above the coast. From Witzeh the shore falls from the east to the west, as it bends to the south. At the western extremity of this curve rises Cape Joros. In the middle is situated Trebizond, become, since the commercial blockade of Russia, one of the most important places of the Black sea, being the great entrepot of all the articles of importation and exportation from northern Persia and Turkey in Trebizond, which amounts to fifty millions of francs, and which is carried on with Constantinople by a regular line of steamers. Trebizond sends into every part of Asia the products of into every part of Asia the products of British industry, so that England has the greatest interest that this place should not fall into the power of the Russians. But, abstraction made of that consideration, the situation of Russia, in appearance so powerful, is exceed ingly critical on the eastern shore of the sea. She possesses there only detached forts and the Turks have taken one of them, that of St. Nicholas, which the Russians, notwithstanding all their efforts, have not as yet been able to retake.
